

The anarchists who liberated Paris, and why they did it - Robert P Helms

A short account of General Leclerc's 9th Company, better known as La Nueve, who were the first allied soldiers to link with the resistance in the liberation of Paris.

This year [2004] has marked the 60th anniversary of the liberation of France from the Nazis and their puppet government, which was headquartered at the town of Vichy. One fact that's not often celebrated is that the first allied soldiers to enter Paris and drive to the Hôtel de Ville were a tank company, comprised of 120 Spanish Anarchists who had wound up, together as a unit, in the army of Marechal Philippe Leclerc*. Before examining the proud and special case of these comrades, let me touch upon how Paris remembers that day; what the day means elsewhere in France; why it was so important that the fascist regime was crushed.

It's not so easy to say who was more intensely hated by the French People in the final days of the occupation: the Germans or the Vichy police. Neither were loved, but the French fascists and those who collaborated with them were hated more intimately, for more personal reasons.

I have only recently become European, having moved house less than a year ago. I'm a newcomer, and before that I was a history-obsessed tourist who dropped in now and then. What can I share about this year of memory, especially just this past August 25th, when Paris was decked out with the national colors, and actors drove along the grand boulevards in period uniforms and old military vehicles? Let's start early in the morning, when I leave my suburban apartment, on my way to work in the city.

At the other end of my street, before I even reach the bus stop, there is a stone plaque on the front of an ordinary two-story house. It reads, "Raymond Langlois was born here on June 30, 1922. Arrested for resistance on October 13, 1940, he died for France while in deportation, on December 15, 1943, at Auschwitz." In other words, three months into the fascist period, 18-year-old Raymond acted against the regime in some way that is probably not known to anyone on my street, and so they took him away, they used him as a slave for three years, and then they murdered him.

I walk another ten minutes to the train station at Noisy-le-Sec. As with just about every station in France, there is a plaque on it, bearing the names of the railroad workers, based at that particular station, who were shot for sabotaging train lines, helping Jews get out of the country, killing Nazis, or for some other good deed during the war. But Noisy-le-Sec has an unusual sadness that is memorialized in the cemetery alongside the station. On the night of April 18, 1944, allied bombers had the job of destroying Noisy's important "marshalling yard." This happens to be a spot along the region's railway system where there are branches going off in various directions, as well as car and equipment storage areas, all of which were vital to the fascist operations. The bombers, from the USA and Canada, not only destroyed the railroad operations, but three-quarters of the town's buildings as well. There were 420 civilian deaths in that one night of friendly-fire bombardment.

The ten-minute ride into the city is a boring one, especially for those who have already done it. I like to take a slightly different walk from the station to work each day so as to know the city better as the weeks go by, and of course to break the monotony. Near where I get off the regional train line is Gare de l'Est (The East Train Station). It has a designated area inside, where large stone plaques tell travelers a few basics about the Nazi-Vichy period in France. One slab lists the names of 70 men and 8 women who worked at that station and who died resisting the fascists. Another slab, which can be missed by a passer-by only with difficulty, states that between 1942 and 1944, more than 70,000 Jews (of which 11,000 were children), were deported from France to Nazi death camps. All of them were sorted out and documented, then sent to the camps from certain suburban train yards, including Drancy and Bobigny. The shame of those towns revisits me whenever I pass through them, which is fairly often because they're near my home, along a trolley line

Posted By

Kate Sharpley

May 1 2015 09:30

Tags

France, La Nueve,
Robert P. Helms,
French Resistance,
Paris, Spanish civil war,
World War II

ShareTweetLike 934ShareRelated*Review: La Nueve: 24

August 1944. The Spanish Republicans who liberated Paris- Evelyn Mesquida
1943-1944: The CNT and the liberation of Paris
1939-1945: Spanish Resistance in France
Review: Soldiers of the night: the story of the French resistance by David Schoenbrun
Martín Bellido, Antonio, 1938-2014

Attached files*Featured*Paul Mason's workers' bombers

Paul Mason's response to BAE job losses has been to promote a 'left-wing' brand of militarism, summing up many of the problems facing the UK left as it coalesces around the Labour Party, and the...

Comments \(2\)On workers' autonomy - Miguel Amoros

Brief remarks concerning the meaning of the word "autonomy" in the context of political struggles since the time of Marx, with special emphasis on the period of the Spanish Transition to...

We are all "amigos"

J. Pierce talks about expectations of white workers to accept racism and division in the workplace.

Comments \(5\)Working Class ...Like Page

Follow @wrkclasshistory 11.1K followers

libcom.orgLike Page

Follow @libcomorg 26.8K followers

Info

The libcom library contains nearly 20,000 articles. If it's your first time on the site, or you're looking for something specific, it can be difficult to know where to start. Luckily, there's a range of ways you can filter the library content to suit your needs, from casual browsing to researching a particular topic. Click here for the guide.

If you have an ebook reader or a Kindle, check out our guide to using ebook readers with libcom.org.

If you'd like to upload content to the library which is in line with the aims of the site or will otherwise be of interest to libcom users, please check out our guides to submitting library/history articles and tagging articles. If you're not sure if something is appropriate for the library, please ask in the feedback and content forum. If you don't have permissions to post content yet, just request it here.

that takes me to the home of certain good friends. There's a special fact regarding Drancy, telling of the difference between the hatred of foreign soldiers and the more intimate hatred of murderers who speak one's own language. It was the sorting-yard that handled the largest number of doomed deportees during the war. How many German soldiers were garrisoned at Drancy, making certain that all French Jews and all enemies of the Reich were efficiently ushered to their deaths? There was one: some lieutenant with a desk job.

Memorial plaques in the big stations like the one just described, and the small ones marking where an anti-fascist was either arrested or slaughtered on the given spot, are quite effective in reminding both Parisians and visitors what went on during those years of torment. In Paris, they are all over the place. There's one, however, that has reached farther into my heart than any of the hundreds that I've seen. Alongside the entrance of l'Ecole Belzunce, a heavy plaque, made of dark glass or perhaps plastic, has gold-colored lettering that reads as follows:

To the memory of the students of this school who were deported between 1942 and 1944 because they were Jewish-born. They were exterminated in the death camps, innocent victims of the Nazi barbarism and the Vichy government. More than 500 of these children lived in the 10th arrondissement.

For some reason, even though I have passed this school dozens of times, even though I've shown it to visitors and read the plaque to them, I have until today thought that it was a high school. There are posters and various other signs on the building, and I've never spent more than a minute or so in front of it, which is located in a tight niche, in a fairly busy spot. Today, I noticed the soot-covered words, Ecole Elementaire. I turned to a lady, about 30, who was waiting near me by the entrance, and asked her a question in my lousy, but steadily improving French.

"This is an elementary school? The kids who were deported were little, like this?" I held my hand out, waist-high.

"Yes, that's correct," she replied. "What are the ages of the school's students?" I asked her.

"Six years to ten years old," she told me.

The door opened and a little girl rushed out to the lady, who took her daughter's hand and walked away. She turned momentarily and said goodbye to me. Her little girl was just the way I had put the question: waist-high. By the way, there are 20 arrondissements (districts) in Paris.

A wonderful thing about being an anarchist is that when one travels to another country, there's a whole new set of anarchist stories to learn. The one I'll share now is familiar to all well-versed French anarchists, and in the August 2004 issue of Le Monde Diplomatique, a radical monthly, the tale of the 9th Armored Company at Paris was included in a fine article by Denis Fernandez Recatala.

As the Second World War got underway, there were Spanish anti-fascist partisans all over France, often the best and bravest people in the resistance. The way this developed, in part, was that at the end of the Spanish Civil War in 1939, refugees of the defeated Republican-side armies, including anarchists, were detained in camps along the Mediterranean beaches near Perpignan, not far from the Spanish border. Each morning, gendarmes would march through the barracks, urging the Spaniards to join the French Foreign Legion. Thousands accepted the offer, from every political faction of the former Republicans.

The Foreign Legion was spread all over the French Empire, and in July 1940, each general, in whatever part of the Legion he commanded, decided for himself whether he was with the Vichy government or with the Allies. The legionnaires in North Africa went Vichy, while those in Chad and the Cameroon, under the command of Maréchal Leclerc, sided with the Allies. Anarchists had been dispatched to both these areas. Those under Leclerc continued the fight against Hitler and Mussolini from the beginning, often viewing it as a prelude to their return to Spain and the eventual defeat of General Franco. It is said that even the few anarchists who survived through the war in Algeria under the Vichy command rejoined their comrades in Leclerc's celebrated 2nd Armored Division in time for the complex and brutal task of liberating the capital from the enemy.

Leclerc gave a special assignment to his 9th Armored Company, which was entirely composed of Spanish anarchists, under the command of Captain Raymond Dronne. Because this particular unit was the best in his army for fighting in towns, house by house, street by street, Leclerc had the Spaniards enter the capital first.

At 8:41 p.m. on August 24, 1944, a tank with the name Guadalajara* painted across it entered Paris through the port d'Italie, at the southern end of the city. Their goal was to reach the Hôtel de Ville as quickly as possible, because that key building had already been taken by members of the resistance five days earlier, and they had been fending off assaults by the Germans. The 9th Company was not slow. At 9:22 p.m., 120 Spanish anarchist soldiers arrived, driving 22 vehicles (tanks and half-tracks) painted with names such as Ebro, Teruel, Brunete, and Madrid, after battles of the Spanish War. One of the armored vehicles bore the name Don Quijote*. Another was called Durruti*. This last, of course, honored the legendary anarchist leader who, upon learning of the uprising of the fascist generals in July 1936, quickly transformed labor union organizations into militia units, raided armories for weapons, and drove straight into battle against the fascists. Buenaventura Durruti died during the battle of Madrid four months later.

Log in for more features

Click here to register now. Logged in users:

- ▶ Can comment on articles and discussions
- ▶ Get 'recent posts' refreshed more regularly
- ▶ Bookmark articles to your own reading list
- ▶ Use the site private messaging system
- ▶ Start forum discussions, submit articles, and more...

The 9th Company parked themselves in the square in front of the Hôtel de Ville and were greeted not only by the defenders of the building, but by the public as well. Their first tactic was to install a cannon inside the building in case the Germans attacked again, and this was nicknamed abuelo (grandpa). The cheering crowds gathered around them, asking if they were Americans, but then were surprised to hear them speaking Spanish. Members of the General Council of the Resistance, who were among the defenders and very glad for the reinforcements, warmly greeted Lieutenant Amado Granell.

The remainder of Leclerc's 2nd Armored Division entered Paris during the morning hours of August 25th. By 4 o'clock p.m. on that day, General Dietrich von Choltitz, the German Governor of Paris, signed a document surrendering Paris in front of Leclerc, and thus the city was liberated, at least formally. General Choltitz had been captured two hours earlier by a Spanish soldier named Antonio Gonzalez. During the next few days there were fierce battles all over Paris, and it is estimated that about 500 of the allied troops were Spaniards (including the anarchists of the 9th Company). Some of the worst spilled blood in places that are most familiar to tourists, such as place St. Michel, place de l'Etoile, place de la République, and la Concorde.

One critical fight was at the Hôtel Majestic, headquarters of the Gestapo. Let the reader remember that "Gestapo" is the German acronym for "secret state police" which was part of the Nazi SS, and its entire purpose on this Earth was to complete the mission of the Nazi party. It was not something that pre-dated Hitler's movement, nor did it have a regular peacetime existence in the German constitution. Dozens of the Spaniards fell dead during those same days, and very possibly there were Spanish anarchists, having lost their own land to Franco's thugs, but who gathered their few surviving selves together again and went into the Majestic, slaughtering the last Gestapo rats in Paris or losing their lives in the attempt. They didn't need to know the details from l'Ecole Belzunce, one of the places where Gestapo personnel had rounded up six and eight-year olds by the thousands and then murdered them because they were Jewish. The Spanish anarchists already knew what fascists are made of, and when it was "show time" at the Hôtel Majestic, they knew exactly what to do.

August 25, in Paris, is a day of celebration, every year. However, war is many things, but it's never a simple thing. On that same day, August 25, 1944, a small village located a few hours south of Paris by train was surrounded by German SS troops. The soldiers went to every house, shooting to death everyone they saw and burning down every house. Some of the 124 victims were in their nineties. Others were not yet one. This year, on the day of mourning, the people of Maillé opened a very small museum and solemnly visited their cemetery, where a massive granite stone, full of names, dominates the tiny place. A documentary film was made about the "martyred village of the Touraine." Most French people have never heard of the place.

But memory of the war is noticeably different in that area. The nearby city, Tours, had many of its street names changed by the Vichy regime. The names have never been changed back. The building that was Gestapo headquarters, a place of much death and torture, has no plaque on it. In Paris, the war is remembered everywhere. In Tours, it's almost as though it never happened.

Maréchal Leclerc's army, with its anarchist 9th Company, continued its offensive straight into Germany. Along the way, the Spaniards helped liberate Strasbourg, and they were present when the allies took Berchtesgaden, Hitler's headquarters in the Bavarian Alps. By the time the war ended, there were only a handful of the 9th Company anarchists left alive.

From: Anarcho-Syndicalist Review 40 winter 2004-5, p27-29
[url=http://syndicalist.us/]http://syndicalist.us/[url]

KSL Note on names [2015]

Leclerc : Captain Philippe François Hauteclercque took the cover name François Leclerc (to protect his family in france from reprisals) when he joined the Free French.

Guadalajara was actually a half-track ; Don Quijote was actually known in a mixture of French and Spanish as Don Quichotte. The soldiers of the 9th Company were not allowed to use names of political figures. The halftrack which would have been called Durruti was actually named Los Pinguiños.

For more on the 9th Company, better known as La Nueve, see La Nueve – 24 August 1944. The Spanish Republicans who liberated Paris by Evelyn Mesquida. Translated by Paul Sharkey. Published by Christiebooks, ISBN 978-1-873976-70-8. [url=http://www.christiebooks.com/ChristieBooksWP/2015/04/la-nueve-24-august-1944-the-spanish-republicans-who-liberated-paris-by-evelyn-mesquida-preface-by-jorge-semprun-and-afterword-by-general-michel-roquejoffre/]http://www.christiebooks.com/ChristieBooksWP/2015/04/la-nueve-24-august-1944-the-spanish-republicans-who-liberated-paris-by-evelyn-mesquida-preface-by-jorge-semprun-and-afterword-by-general-michel-roquejoffre/[url]

Originally posted by the KSL at [url=http://www.katesharpleylibrary.net/jm659n]http://www.katesharpleylibrary.net/jm659n[/url]

login or register to post comments

Comments

Chilli Sauce
May 1 2015 13:48

Good little read. Thanks for posting.

login or register to post
comments

plasmately
May 1 2015 19:46

I was told this story by someone when I was discussing joining the DAM. At the time I thought it a bit far fetched that the first tank in to secure the town hall should be carrying an anarchist flag, but as my ever shoddy grasp on historical events grows marginally stronger, it turned out to be an understatement. Anyway, here's a picture of that first tank (it still exists, btw):

jef costello
May 2 2015 17:20

The French also agreed/were told to remove black soldiers who had been fighting since 1941 from Leclerc's army as the American Army which was segregated and insisted that blacks could not be in tank units (one managed to keep his place). Otherwise there would also have been Senegalese troops in those tanks.

login or register to post
comments

Sadly a lot of those anarchists were under the impression that once the fascist dictators in Italy and Germany (and France depending on how you view the collaboration regime) had been dealt with they would then go on to the fascist dictator in Spain.

ernesto_hombre
May 3 2015 04:38

It's good to see this again. I remember Albert Meltzer telling me about this episode when I was in London in 1975. The Christie Books publication mentioned above is a great read and well worth seeking out a copy. Kudos to Kate Sharpley.

login or register to post
comments

Kate Sharpley
May 3 2015 13:10

ernesto_hombre wrote:
Kudos to Kate Sharpley.

login or register to post
comments

Just the messenger on this one. Kudos goes to the comrades who did the fighting... and to those who did the writing (EM and RH) [edit - but it's nice to be thanked!]

Jef is correct about the Spanish exiles expecting to go on and deal with Franco. Mesquida's book has an interesting quote:
"All of us Spaniards in the battalion were different, with different political leanings, but we were all united by a shared hatred of the Germans, a craving for freedom and the firm belief that the Allies would help us liberate Spain. The French knew how to put that hatred to good use." (p203-4 of "La Nueve", testimony of Manuel Fernández (Belmonte)).

Her book (being the story of a unit) doesn't really go into the details of how "liberation" was reduced to "military defeat of Germany".

Steven.
May 3 2015 18:13

plasmately wrote:

I was told this story by someone when I was discussing joining the DAM. At the time I thought it a bit far fetched that the first tank in to secure the town hall should be carrying an anarchist flag, but as my ever shoddy grasp on historical events grows marginally stronger, it turned out to be an understatement. Anyway, here's a picture of that first tank (it still exists, btw):

login or register to post
comments

that's great, do you know who the people in the picture are, or if they were anarchists?

Edited to add don't worry, I've answered my own question:

Quote:

French soldiers of the 1st Platoon, 2nd Armored Division (French: 2e Division Blindée) pose with their tank Romilly in Bois de Boulogne park in Paris following the city's liberation. Pictured are (left to right): François Jaouen, Roland Hoerdt, André Peseux, François Collon and Pierre Coatpehen.

According to <http://histomil.com/viewtopic.php?f=338&p=107417#ixzz3Z6OJcyel>

Silentfactor
Aug 24 2016 20:12

"Black WW2 heroes deliberately removed from the unit that liberated Paris.

WW2 papers reveal that Allied commanders ensured that the liberation of Paris on 25 August 1944 was seen as a "whites only" victory. Many fought Nazi Germany to defeat the racism that left millions of Jews dead. Yet the black colonial soldiers, 2/3 of Free French forces, were removed from the unit that led the Allied advance in Paris. Charles de Gaulle wanted his Frenchmen to lead the liberation of Paris, and Allied High Command agreed on one condition: De Gaulle's division must not have any black soldiers. Dwight Eisenhower's Chief of Staff, Major General Walter Bedell Smith wrote: "It is more desirable that the division ... consist of white personnel." (BBC)"

hitlernews.cloudworth.com/black-soldiers-units.php

login or register to post comments

 Steven.
Aug 24 2016 21:12

Silentfactor wrote:

"Black WW2 heroes deliberately removed from the unit that liberated Paris.

WW2 papers reveal that Allied commanders ensured that the liberation of Paris on 25 August 1944 was seen as a "whites only" victory. Many fought Nazi Germany to defeat the racism that left millions of Jews dead. Yet the black colonial soldiers, 2/3 of Free French forces, were removed from the unit that led the Allied advance in Paris. Charles de Gaulle wanted his Frenchmen to lead the liberation of Paris, and Allied High Command agreed on one condition: De Gaulle's division must not have any black soldiers. Dwight Eisenhower's Chief of Staff, Major General Walter Bedell Smith wrote: "It is more desirable that the division ... consist of white personnel." (BBC)"

hitlernews.cloudworth.com/black-soldiers-units.php

login or register to post comments

yeah just followed the link on that to its original source: <http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/europe/7984436.stm>

I did not know that, that is absolutely appalling. Another good lesson for anyone who thinks World War II was a battle against racism...

blog

libcom - 6 underrated Marxists who don't get enough love
Comrade Motopu - Right and Left against the state: education without classes
Mike Harman - Paul Mason's workers' bombers

news

Pyotr Ryabov, anarchist philosopher imprisoned for 6 days in Belarus, declared a hungerstrike
Picket at the Belarusian Embassy in Moscow
Until Victory: film about struggles in Italy's meat industry

library

Origins of the Friends of Durutti; the opposition to militarisation and Balus' journalistic career
Give up activism
'Bout to explode: a day in the life of a precarious worker

history

The Slocum massacre, 1910
The Commune: Paris 1871 – P. Guillaume and Martin Grainger
A successful rent strike in 1930s Peckham

libcom.org

about | donate | help out | submitting content | other languages | a-z | contact us | site notes